As we gallop into new millennium technology it is inevitable that new forms of allergy treatment will enter the field. Bioresonance therapy has been around for a while (mainly in Germany) but is only now beginning to get established in the UK, although early studies took place at Salford University. The patients reactions to over 1,000 substances can be diagnosed by means of collating and analysing electromagnetic oscillations and this determines which are the ones causing the health problem. The system is said to detect allergens (food and no food), various toxins, mycosis (moulds and fungus), parasites and physical or emotional trauma. Treatment consists of creating a mirror image of the oscillations that are harmful and these low frequencies are returned to the patient, also enhancing the body's own natural harmonious oscillations. It's purpose is to provide a comprehensive detoxification which improves the immune system and so restores the body's self-regulation system.
